In social interactions we constantly assess other people with regard to different personal characteristics and we do surprisingly well given the minimal information available. There is 28 evidence that people can be accurate at better-than-chance level when forming impressions of others' personality characteristics based on photographs, brief 29 , or after having 30 with another. People are also accurate at drawing 31 about the relationship between two interaction partners. Within the domain of interpersonal interactions, one of the most important 32 is status. However, research has rarely looked at whether we are accurate in assessing hierarchical relationships and status in others, and how we form such impressions. The goal of the 33 research was to see whether people can assess others' status at better-than-chance level and to shed light 34 the mechanisms involved in the accuracy of judging status. More specifically, we looked at whether the 35 observers use to assess status in targets are the ones that are diagnostic of actual target status and whether target gender moderated these effects.

Section B

There are several passages in this section. Each passage is followed by some questions or unfinished statements. For each of them there are four choices marked A), B), C) and D). You should decide on the best choice.

Passage One

Questions 36 to 40 are based on the following passage.

When you go to the emergency room, you expect the doctors and nurses to have the latest information and skills available. If you need a lawyer, you want that person to be up to date on precedents (判例), case law (判例法) and trends. Change is a certainty, especially in professional fields such as medicine, law and finance. Their dynamic nature demands continuous education for the people who practice them. That's where continuing education classes come in.

Many professionals such as doctors are required to take continuing education classes.

In many fields, continuing education isn't an option. But, lawyers, doctors, nurses, architects, teachers and many other licensed (执照的) professionals must complete a certain number of credit hours to maintain their professional certification (专业资格). Licensing boards that certify (给……颁发合格证书) or register a person in a profession or occupation are often set up by government agencies. These agencies set standards and ensure that individuals meet the standards by taking and completing courses that specifically meet their continuing education requirements.

Continuing education protects everyone. It protects professionals by ensuring they keep their skills up-to-date, preventing those skills from becoming outdated. Professionals also have the opportunity to network (与……建立联系) with each other when attending continuing education courses.

At the same time, continuing education protects clients by making sure the professionals they hire are proficient, competent and familiar with the latest advances in their fields. Doctors, for instance, might be required to take a continuing education course on advancements in antibiotics, increasing their knowledge about specialty drugs they might need to prescribe. Dentists, on the other hand, might learn about advances in pain control so that their patients can undergo more pain-free treatment.

Advancements would work their way into the mainstream much more slowly without continuing education, and both professionals and their clients would suffer consequently. In recent years, the growth of the Internet has resulted in the availability of online courses, which makes it easier for professionals to acquire this valuable training.

Pros and Cons of Online Continuing Education Classes

As has been said, online continuing education courses offer many advantages. The courses often give more flexibility at lower cost, because the professional doesn't have to waste time and money commuting to class. For those who are disabled, online courses also offer advantages.

By choosing courses from the Web, professionals can choose from a larger menu of classes. They also have a better chance of finding exactly the classes they want, as well as those that are approved and specifically meet their continuing education requirements. Professionals can also keep working while they take online courses. Tuition is usually less expensive, as well.

However, taking continuing education classes online can have a downside. While video conferencing is quite effective, communication often is best face to face. The online student can miss out on the interaction with other professionals. Networking and sharing experiences with other professionals over lunch and during class can be a valuable part of continuing education. Finally, technical issues can arise, sometimes at the most inappropriate times. Running into such a problem during an online test could put a person's professional certification at risk.

What Does the Future Hold?

Most education-trend watchers agree that online education will continue to expand. Technology continues to improve, along with connectivity. People everywhere are becoming more comfortable with and dependent on technology to pass information back and forth. Hardware and software with better interactivity are expected to make the virtual classroom experience more "real." And though few would say the end of the traditional classroom is around the corner, online classrooms are expected to become a bigger part of the continuing education movement.

Passage Two

Questions 41 to 45 are based on the following passage.

It was during the heatwave of 1974 that my girlfriend and I decided to explore part of Morocco's northwest coastline with a donkey, the animal's purpose being to relieve us of our heavy backpacks. Accordingly, we sought out the market in a local village and inquired about buying an animal. A huge crowd instantly gathered round us, and a donkey was led forwards. Amid roars of laughter, we bargained with its owner and handed over what we were later told was an absurdly high sum.

No matter, we now had a donkey, a solid-looking creature whom we named Blossom. We loaded her up and set off along the coast, which was everything we had hoped, being very wild, with only a few dwellings scattered at long intervals. Blossom, however, proved to be a problem, as she soon made it clear that she had no intention whatsoever of doing as she was told. She halted frequently and no matter how often we hit her sides with a stick, as we had been instructed, this had no effect on her. Nonetheless, we made some progress and spent the afternoon on a sandy and completely deserted beach. That night we slept out and carefully tethered Blossom to a small tree before climbing into our sleeping bags.

Imagine our dismay the next morning when we woke to find no sign of Blossom. Convinced that she had been stolen, we headed back the way we had come. On inquiry at the first house we came to, its inhabitants, after laughing their heads off for fully ten minutes, and making galloping movements, pointed towards the market. When we got there, about four hours later, the whole village was waiting for us and Blossom was led forwards looking unrepentant. We embraced her, loaded her up and set off once more.

43. 3. The couple bought a donkey called Blossom, but she _____.

- A) did not obey them
- B) hardly moved at all
- C) got upset when hit by a stick
- D) hated her new owners

44. The couple loaded Blossom and set off along the coast, which _____.

- A) had villages along it
- B) had very few people living there
- C) was different from what they had expected
- D) had no one living there

45. The next morning, the couple found that Blossom _____.

- A) had been stolen
- B) had run away back to her owner
- C) looked very sorry
- D) was waiting for them on the way

Section C

In this section, you are going to read a passage with ten statements attached to it. Each statement contains information given in one of the paragraphs. Identify the paragraph from which the information is derived. You may choose a paragraph more than once. Each paragraph is marked with a letter. Answer the questions by marking the corresponding letter.

Why Do We Dream?

[A] For centuries, we've tried to figure out just why we dream. Researchers continue to toss around many theories about dreaming. Those theories essentially fall into two categories: the idea that dreams are only physiological stimulations and the idea that dreams are psychologically necessary.

[B] Physiological theories are based on the idea that we dream in order to exercise various neural connections that some researchers believe affect certain types of learning. Psychological theories are based on the idea that dreaming allows us to sort through problems, events of the day or things that are requiring a lot of our attention. Some of these theorists think dreams might be prophetic. Many researchers and scientists also believe that perhaps it is a combination of the two theories.

Dreaming and the Brain

[C] When we sleep, we go through five sleep stages. The first stage is a very light sleep from which it is easy to wake up. The second stage moves into a slightly deeper sleep, and stages three and four represent our deepest sleep. Our brain activity throughout these stages is gradually slowing down so that by deep sleep, we experience nothing but delta brain waves — the slowest brain waves. About 90 minutes after we go to sleep and after the fourth sleep stage, we begin REM sleep. Rapid eye movement (REM) was discovered in 1953 by University of Chicago researchers Eugene Aserinsky, a graduate student in physiology, and Nathaniel Kleitman, Ph.D., chair of physiology. REM sleep is primarily characterized by movements of the eyes and is the fifth stage of sleep.

How to Improve Your Dream Recall

[D] It is said that five minutes after the end of a dream, we have forgotten 50 percent of the dream's content. Ten minutes later, we've forgotten 90 percent of its content. Why is that? We don't forget our daily actions that quickly. The fact that they are so hard to remember makes their importance seem less. There are many resources both on the Web and in print that will give you tips on how to improve your recall of dreams. Those who believe we have a lot to learn about ourselves from our dreams are big proponents of dream journals. Here are some steps you can take to increase your dream recall:

[E] When you go to bed, tell yourself you will remember your dreams. Set your alarm to go off every hour and a half so you'll wake up around the times that you leave REM sleep — when you're most likely to remember your dreams. (Or, drink a lot of water before you go to bed to ensure you have to wake up at least once in the middle of the night!). Keep a pad and pencil next to your bed. Try to wake up slowly to remain within the "mood" of your last dream.

Common Dream Themes and Their Interpretations

Being naked in public

[F] Most of us have had the dream at some point that we're at school, work or some social event, and we suddenly realize we forgot to put on clothes!

[G] Experts say this means:

1. We're trying to hide something (and without clothes we have a hard time doing that).
2. We're not prepared for something, like a presentation or test (and now everyone is going to know — we're exposed!). If we're naked but no one notices, then the interpretation is that whatever we're afraid of is unfounded. If we don't care that we're naked, the interpretation is that we're comfortable with who we are.

Falling

[H] You're falling, falling, falling ... and then you wake up. This is a very common dream and is said to symbolize insecurity and anxiety. Something in your life is essentially out of control and there is nothing you can do to stop it. Another interpretation is that you have a sense of failure about something. Maybe you're not doing well in school or at work and are afraid you're going to be fired or expelled. Again, you feel that you can't control the situation.

Being chased

[I] The ever-popular chase dream can be extremely frightening. What it usually symbolizes is that you're running away from your problems. What that problem is depends on who is chasing you. It may be a problem at work, or it may be something about yourself that you know is destructive. For example, you may be drinking too much, and your dream may be telling you that your drinking is becoming a real problem.

Taking an exam (or forgetting that you have one)

[J] This is another very common dream. You suddenly realize you are supposed to be taking an exam at that very moment. You might be running through the hallways and can't find the classroom. This type of dream can have several variations that have similar meanings. (Maybe your pen won't write, so you can't finish writing your answers.) What experts say this may mean is that you're being scrutinized about something or feel you're being tested — maybe you're facing a challenge you don't think you're up to. You don't feel prepared or able to hold up to the scrutiny. It may also mean there is something you've neglected that you know needs your attention.

Flying

[K] Many flying dreams are the result of lucid dreaming (清醒梦). Not all flying dreams are, however. Typically, dreaming that you are flying means you are on top of things. You are in control of the things that matter to you. Or, maybe you've just gained a new perspective on things. It may also mean you are strong-willed and feel like no one and nothing can defeat you. If you are having problems maintaining your flight, someone or something may be standing in the way of you having control. If you are afraid while flying, you may have challenges that you don't feel up to.

Running, but going nowhere

[L] This theme can also be part of the chasing dream. You're trying to run, but either of your legs won't move or you simply aren't going anywhere — as if you were on a treadmill (踏车). According to some, this dream means you have too much on your plate. You're trying to do too many things at once and can't catch up or ever get ahead.

46. The deeper we sleep, the slower our brain activity is._____
47. If you are escaping from certain problems, you might have the dream that someone is chasing you._____
48. If you have a dream in which you are naked, you might be hiding something in your real life._____
49. People are highly likely to remember their dreams if they wake up during REM sleep._____
50. Dreams could be physiological stimulations, psychological movements or a combination of both._____
51. The dreams that you are running might stand for the fact that you are dealing with too many things at the same time._____
52. The dream about falling may imply your nervousness and lack of security._____
53. Movements of the eyes are typical characters of the fifth stage of sleep._____
54. The flying dreams might be the result of your new understanding on things._____
55. Dreaming about taking exams may indicate that you haven't paid attention to the things that you are supposed to take seriously._____
